About TEDx

TED is a nonprofit organization devoted to promote “ideas worth spreading.” TED began as a four-day conference in California 30 years ago, and it started multiple initiatives to support the mission. The two TED Conferences held annually in Vancouver, British Columbia invite the world’s leading thinkers and doers to share their experiences and innovative ideas. Accomplished individuals who have shared their experiences and ideas on TED include Bill Gates, Jane Goodall, Elizabeth Gilbert, Richard Branson, Nandan Nilekani, Gitanjali Rao, Shashi Tharoor, Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala, Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie, and Daniel Kahneman.

TED’s media initiatives include TED.com, where the organization uploads talks regularly, TED Translators who provide subtitles, interactive transcripts as well as translations from volunteers across the globe, and the educational initiative TED-Ed. TEDx events are organized by institutions that seek to create platforms for encouraging conversations around new ideas and inspiring experiences in their communities.

Hey, It's Okay to Fail!

In today's world, where artificial intelligence hums like an echo and bullet trains race through time, human life often narrows down to two dominant metaphors: the metaphor of the race and the metaphor of winning. Yet, the unfolding of an individual's life can be better understood through the age-old metaphor of a journey—a journey that breezes through terrains both bumpy and smooth. Unfortunately, the world is keen to measure people by the cold metrics of currency and reach, conveniently ignoring the days spent navigating tough roads, and unforeseen trials.

The romantic image of success as an overnight climb to the pinnacle is nothing short of a myth—one that needs a re-imagination. In a world obsessed with competition, the very whisper of failure induces anxiety. The modern factories that churn out so-called success icons often overlook the bedrock upon which success is built: the willingness to fail.

In search of sanity in the otherwise madding crowd, we sometimes want to nestle into the world of art, be it through a film, a painting, a poem or a novel. Hemingway's Santiago, or Homer's Odysseus, would not have stood the test of time if not for their resilience amidst hardships, and so are the stories of both art and artists. The world would not shine as brightly as it does today if Thomas Edison were unwilling to embrace his failures. Pravin Tambe's courage to fail made him stick to his cricket dreams for more than twenty long years. Youths across generations find the journeys of Oprah Winfrey, and Marilyn Monroe inspiring, predominantly for their bravery in the face of defeats.

These stories pose a question that resonates through the ages: Who are we, if not for our willingness to fail? It's time we reimagine failure through a more positive metaphor — seeing it not as a setback, but as a new learning. In a world that relentlessly chases success, let us be kind to ourselves and remind one another — hey, it's okay to fail! The second edition of TEDxSJCC invites you to listen to stories of people who dared to fail. Join us to hear how their journey transformed once they began viewing failure as a building block.
